THE ARMY OF FRANCE.

After All It Is a Strong and Noble Organization. From the Chicago Times-Herald.

The French army, to save whose haman beings are crushed like ants and justice smitten in the face, is really a noble organization, notwithstanding the corruption that may exist among some of its superior officers, The army is organized on laws passed by the national assembly of 1872. These have been modified, enlarged and adjusted by additional laws voted by various legislatures from 1875 to 1892. To understand the very deep concern that s felt about the army by French people-a concern similar to ours about the volunteers-one need only remember that by law there is universal liability to arms, and that substitution or enlistment by payment of money is forbidden. Any French citizen between the ages of twenty and fortyfive who has not been pronounced unnt for military service may be called upon at any time to become a soldier, either in the active service or in the reserves. Thus it will be seen how personal a matter the military becomes for every Frenchman. There is a law (1882), supplemented by later laws, providing that the yearly contingent must serve three years in the active service, ten in the reserve pertinent army to the regular army, six in the territorial reserve. The army in active service is made up of all young men-"the flower of France" -who have just reached the age of twenty. The reserve that is held immediately behind this active army consists of the men who have served out their time in the active army. These two branches of the French army-this is, the actives and the active reserves-are drawn from over the whole of France and are distributed over the whole of France. The territorial army and its reserves, however, are assigned to locations fixed by the administration from time to

The budget for the present year show that the peace strength of the French army amounts to 546,044 men. Of this total number 26,042 are officers. These figures describe the home army alone and mean that the nation has that many men at hand in France. The army in Algiers consists of 55,911 men, of whom 2,197 are officers, and the army in Tunis consists of 13,485 men, of whom 552 are officers, Add the number of the home army to that of the army abroad and the total will be 615,413, of whom 29,151 are officers. Including all the departments the French army has 142,038 horses in its service. If France were called upon to engage in war with any Euopean nation at his time she would ready to put into the field 541,626 for the active army alone, and 25,790 for the endarmerie and the republican guards. That is a pretty good fighting force to throw into action at once. We thought we were doing capitally by raising our big volunteer army in the Spanish war, but had our enemy been France instead Spain, what another story we would telling now. France, back of her superb army, has a grand store of men draw on. The number of men liable
